From the London Times, October 17, 1894.

The manner in which accounts are taught is tedious and unsatisfactory. The pupil is disgusted, because the systems adopted are so perplexed with difficulties that all attempts at deductions from the premises are futile, and so much labor lest. Now Mr. Foster teaches bookkeeping—not by drilling the learner into a calculating machine, but by enabling him to reason and comprehend what he is about to do. The rules are plain and uncerting, and any person of common capacity may understand his system and be able to unravel accounts, however complicated, and to keep books in a clear and satisfactory manner.
